The Mass Incarceration Community Education Project of The Clark-Fox Family Foundation seeks to inform the public and community leadership about the hidden system of mass incarceration. After extensive research we have mapped the ecosystem of Mass Incarceration in America. Our conclusion is that this system of oppression and its negative impact on children and their families, our region, and the nation is perhaps the most critical issue of our time. The project aims to educate those who serve children so they can make informed decisions on how best to protect the children they serve from a system that feeds off vulnerable families and their children. Presentations include an overview of the system, impact on the community, and a discussion around reform efforts. When possible, presentations also include a formerly incarcerated individual who shares their real lived experience in the system and their contributions since returning to the community.

CORE PRESENTATION: Core ecosystem presentations are approximately 30 minutes in length with a short question and answer section.

COMPLETE PRESENTATION: Ideal presentation formats include a core ecosystem presentation approximately 30 minutes in length, a 20-minute presentation from a formerly incarcerated individual who shares their lived experience, followed by a short question and answer section.

PRESENTATION TAILORING: The project team tailors its presentation to each group. We include content relevant to the listeners such as detailed information about the impact of incarceration on children and families for presentations to school districts and youth service providers.

PRESENTATIONS TO YOUNG ADULTS: Our presentation can also be tailored specifically to young adults. The presentation format changes slightly and is more interactive and the content is prevention-oriented and deepens understanding of the risks of becoming involved in the criminal justice system.
